

Control of the majority of radio and television broadcasting capability by a small number of large corporations represents a direct threat to freedom of speech and democratic process. The FCC should pursue the interests of the American people by further restricting concentration of broadcast ownership. In addition, broadcasters should be obligated to provide limited free broadcast time to any political candidate who achieves ballot listing within their broadcast area.